

Are you the parent or legal guardian of a 13-17 year old girl?

Teen SCREEN Research Study

Researchers at the University of Pittsburgh are seeking adolescent girls (ages 13-17) to participate in a research study to better understand how adolescents' social media experiences, other social interactions, and the brain influence emotional health.

We are recruiting adolescent girls who have had suicidal thoughts or engaged in self-harm within the past 3 months, as well as adolescent girls who have not had these experiences.

This research study does not involve any treatments or medication.

Participation involves:

- A few visits to the University of Pittsburgh (or at home via internet if preferred) over the course of one year
- Interviews and questionnaires to measure thoughts, feelings and behaviors
- An fMRI scan measuring your child's brain activity during a series of computerized tasks
- Three 10-day at-home assessments over the course of 3 months that involve repeated short phone questionnaires and mobile-sensing technology that measures the amount of time spent on phone apps
- Allowing the study team to view non-identifiable summary data of your child's public social media posts on platforms such as Twitter, Facebook, Instagram, Reddit, Tumblr, etc.

Compensation will be provided.
